Windows offers some handy tools to configure security settings, like the User Account Control (UAC) and the Windows Firewall. But these tools are far from perfect, as they're very limited and most of the time have trouble finding ways to protect the PC properly against malicious software or other security threats, even though they're coded in a way that makes them seem like they do the job. Computer users, particularly those working in business, need to know how to configure their Windows computers, including the security settings. This is a must-know, which can be achieved using a one-click solution called BigFix. It's a fully automated patching and security software, which can be combined with some other Windows-related tools into an extremely powerful solution, a sort of security software pack, which can be installed on a single computer or a multi-computer network. As with a regular security tool, the BigFix application scans the system automatically and informs users of any possible security threat it may find on the computer. Also, the tool brings a group of useful tools to the user's fingertips to deal with all identified issues. Other security-related issues that the BigFix application can handle include: – Protection from viruses, infections and other malicious software – Protection from phishing and malware attacks – Protection from online piracy – Protection from malicious browser cookies The tool also has a tool menu, which allows the users to activate or deactivate the security tools inside the application. Of course, most of these tools are automated ones. Therefore, users just have to install the application once and let it work. The complete list of possible issues it can alert users about includes: • Exceptions • Outdated software • Malware and adware • Junk pop-ups • User accounts with permissions insufficiently set • Cross-site scripting • Unsafe browser scripts The Windows version of BigFix can be bought in two forms: • A 90-day trial version • A version that is licensed for use on a computer network and includes all the security tools users need to keep their computers protected There's also a BigFix Cloud Edition, which features cloud-based tools and has a monthly fee. It's a more advanced version of the original application. Re: Re: Whether such a tool is useful or not, is not the issue. The issue is whether there is any reasonable, good sense

What's New in the BigFix?

The Heretix Connect Backup solution is a software product that integrates all of the components used to backup and retrieve personal data from a computer, and in addition to that, it is also able to create a backup of all computers from your organization that will be available from any location. This is a solution for personal and corporate use. Heretix is a solution with components that allows you to replicate data to remote sites, and also to retrieve data from a remote server. Newly added features in version 4 include: • Backup of Microsoft® Exchange Server 2010 and other email accounts • Easier integration with third-party software products • Ability to create multiple backups in a single go from one server BigFix is a Windows software solution designed to lend you a hand when trying to keep your computer secure, providing all the necessary tools to patch vulnerabilities and security holes. Although you may find the interface a bit overwhelming at the first glance, it's all just a matter of time until you get used to it, so it's actually a very straightforward design. The application automatically scans the system and informs you about any security issue that may exist on a computer, including bugs, outdated software solutions and other security flaws that may put your data at risk. Obviously, since it detects all problems in just a few seconds, BigFix also comes with dedicated tools to fix all of them with just a few clicks, without assaulting the user with complex features. There's a settings menu as well, but the options available in there are only limited and mostly concern the Internet connection preferences. And speaking of Internet connection, your computer must be connected to the Internet in order to retrieve the latest patches. Of course, BigFix runs on a moderate amount of computer resources and while it works okay on older versions of Windows, there seem to be some compatibility issues on Windows 7. Sometimes it fails to launch, while in some cases the app crashes all of a sudden. All in all, BigFix is indeed a very handy piece of software, but some upgrades are absolutely mandatory. Plus, a more user-friendly approach, including a revised interface and more advanced configuration screens would not hurt anyone. BigFix Description: The Heretix Connect Backup solution is a software product that integrates all of the components used to backup and retrieve personal data from a computer, and in addition to that, it is also able to create a backup of all computers from your organization that will be available from
