The therapeutic effects of psychosocial interventions for post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) have not been systematically reviewed. In this systematic review and meta-analysis, we examined the efficacy of psychosocial interventions for PTSD in children and adolescents. Multiple search databases, including Medline, PsycINFO, and Cochrane Collaboration, were searched through March 2012. We included randomised controlled trials (RCTs) that tested the efficacy of psychosocial interventions in children and adolescents. We excluded studies that used a non-RCT design. Eight RCTs were included in this study, which assessed 196 participants, with ages ranging from 6 to 17 years (mean=11.3 years, standard deviation=1.4 years). The psychosocial interventions included cognitive behavioural therapy (CBT), trauma-focused CBT, and counselling. The evidence from this meta-analysis suggests that interventions that include anxiety and trauma symptoms as treatment targets are more effective in reducing PTSD symptoms than interventions that do not target these symptoms. The evidence also suggests that interventions that are delivered in a school setting and utilising multiple psychological skills in the treatment package are more effective than interventions that do not employ multiple skills. The evidence base on this topic has not yet matured and we highlight the need for future high-quality research. Further research should be conducted to explore the effectiveness of psychosocial interventions for PTSD in children and adolescents who have experienced other forms of trauma./* * Copyright 2010-2020 Amazon.com, Inc. or its affiliates.
