Did you look at the register.log.txt file at that time.

It's a process of finding an issue with other software. This logs and records the number of times the computer been restarted since the Windows OS was installed. This would seem to eliminate any hardware issue as the problem. I'm glad you now have a temporary fix to your problem and we're glad to have you back on line. We'd be glad to hear a more extensive description of your problem.

Sometimes when the security system has certain issues it requires a restart of the computer to correct. As soon as you are back on line, please go to security | settings | manage settings | windows memory | button | apply and see if that corrects any of your problems. If not, please continue to report back here. If everything's okay we're glad to have you back on line. Something may have been triggered that disabled your ability to have access to security | settings | manage settings | windows memory | button | apply. If that does not work, please continue to report back here. If your issue still persists, you may need to remove and reinstall your WiFi adapter to be able to perform the task at security | settings | manage settings | windows memory | button | apply. Once that is done, please
