Given the heavy focus on in-game physics and new match engine this year, it may not be a surprise to hear that, while FIFA 19's Training Mode engine was also overhauled. EA Sports has used the Fifa 22 Download With Full Crack testing data from various players to build a new "Training Mode" that not only tests your in-game skills against computer-controlled players, but also includes a physical dashboard — much like the old Player Impact Engine (PIE) did, but with a more aggressive focus on gameplay feedback. This dashboard shows your ratings for Acceleration, Elusiveness, Physicality, Accuracy and Successful Passes. The different rankings mean you'll be shown a number of feedback graphs as you play. You can see your ratings quickly fall or rise over short stints of gameplay, but overall it's a much more versatile system than the old PIE, and it also rewards you for how you play rather than just how much you did. The more you play, the faster your ratings will rise and the more you'll get shown in-game. FIFA 22's Training Mode shows you how much time you've played, how long you've been training, and how many rating points you've earned in your career so far. There's also a skill rating panel at the bottom of the screen, and you can read up on the ratings you've achieved for each player to see how many points you've currently been awarded for. A while back, it was revealed that FIFA 20 would feature a new 'real player' mode, and now we have an idea as to what's coming. "Real player" mode has been around since FIFA 11. In "real player," you take the role of real-life player who's motion-captured in-game. Eventually, you're told, this player's real-life stats will be added in as you play, and your FIFA game will become more closely linked to your real life — and vice versa. Which is to say, by using "real player" mode, you're not only fighting against the 'player controller' you've programmed by playing against the AI (though you still have the option to choose from two fixed player "fitness settings" at the start), but you're also playing
