Cleaner PC/Windows [Updated]

BinaryFileUpdater is a tool that optimizes and updates binary files. It makes use of the lightest means possible to update files and makes the update process faster. The application first compares the files in the system and backups those that have been modified. After that, the application extracts the new files and overwrites the current ones. What makes the tool unique is it's ability to actually break the package files so you can customize the files that should be used to patch the file with the new one.

User interface When the software starts for the first time a wizard will take you through the set-up options. There are seven settings to choose from, each being responsible for a different detail of the process. The first section of the settings allows you to choose the folder where new/updates files should be saved. It's recommended to use a folder inside the C:/Program Files folder to save the final package file so you don't have to overwrite the whole folder with new files. After that section, the software shows you the list of files that have been updated and makes it very simple to choose the files that should be stored to update the binary file. You are also provided with the option to keep the current version, which happens to be important in the case you want to revert back to the previous version. The second settings section is responsible for the process variant. There are two choices; just overwrites and replaces older file with newer ones or split the pack, and replace the existing files with the smaller ones, and then add new files on top, which means that you will need to replace the current version with the new one manually. The rest of the options includes the mode, the function, the type of file and the language. Each of them holds a specific purpose to the process and makes it a little bit easier to use. Just to illustrate what each of them is responsible for, the mode has got the options, incremental and full update. This is going to be the basic update process for files that have already been created. Then there is the function, which can be either Simple or Advanced. The latter will make the process a little bit easier by offering a preview of the files. If it is a brand new binary file, the preview will help you avoid mistakes or even generate new files accidentally. After the function, there is the type of file. There are three options, starting with the standard file, the ZIP file, and a few of the new program's homepage and the system requirements. GetSystemInfo InfoCenter is a freeware program that records and displays information about your system hardware/software and installed programs. The primary functionality of this program includes monitoring system hardware and software, such as the processor, memory, chipset, and hard drive, and recording system information about the installed programs, including a list of all currently running processes, details about installed applications, and information about the personalization settings of the desktop. The main window displays information about the registered and active hardware and software components. Also, it lists the icons of all the installed applications, so you can easily know which programs take up the greatest amount of memory. The program's filters enable you to view information about system hardware and software, installed applications, and user settings such as the time, date, and locale.

Plus, you can record the information about the device used to run this application, so you can save a copy of all the recorded data in a file. The program also allows you to disable the search engine to save system resources. GetSystemInfo InfoCenter is not quite a powerhouse, which means that you have to be careful when configuring the program, as some functions might not perform as expected. However, this free version of the program is a good alternative to other programs that are a bit more extensive and costly. Bottom line GetSystemInfo InfoCenter is a handy freeware program that enables you to view information about your system hardware and software, as well as monitor the performance of your computer.
